

Command-Style A

Description

The following statement applies to each style: A significant factor influencing the quality of teacher education and pedagogical research is the ability to reliably distinguish one teaching style from another. Learning to "see the decisions anatomy " that comprise each style takes time. However, it is possible to distinguish the general image of one style from another rather quickly. The following description offers an image of the classroom that represents this landmark T-L style. This description applies to any teaching event-either a Spectrum or a non-Spectrum classroom. When this description is observed in the classroom, the set of decisions and the learning expectations in subject matter and human behavior are inherently promoted. Thus, each description represents more so than not this teaching-learning style with its distinct O-T-L-O

The teacher selects the task that the students perform in a unison, choreographed or precision performance image following the exact pace and rhythm (cues) set by the teacher.
